

The Truth Behind the Veil: The CIA, The Blob, and Our Aussie Elected Representatives' March to Censorship

G'day Punters!

There's a sinister partnership lurking in the shadows of every policy debate today. You feel it, I feel it, and anyone with a pulse and half a brain has picked up on it. The Misinformation and Disinformation Bill being pushed by both the Liberal-National Party (LNP) and the Australian Labor Party (ALP) isn't just a legislative response to rogue tweets or funny memes. It's much deeper than that. Much darker.

You see, this bill isn't just about protecting Australians from "dangerous" speech. No, it's about making sure the same old elites stay firmly in control, pulling strings from across the Pacific. At the heart of this push is none other than the US State Department and the CIA—the shadow puppeteers who've perfected the art of censorship over decades, and now they've got their hands on our shores.

But let's start with the real villain of the piece—Google. Most people think of Google as a handy search engine, a tech company that grew from humble beginnings in a Stanford dorm room to become the all-seeing eye of the internet. But the truth, punters, is that Google was never the benevolent creation of a couple of nerds in hoodies.

Before Google was Google, it was an intelligence project funded by DARPA (Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency), a joint initiative of the CIA and NSA. The whole idea was to track dissident groups, foreign political actors, and anyone else that the Deep State wanted to keep tabs on. This was back when forums and static web pages were the battlegrounds of political discourse—long before the days of TikTok dances and Instagram reels.

The search engine, originally dubbed the "BackRub engine" (ironic, really), was developed with the express purpose of creating a kind of radar for the political affiliations and movements of online communities. From its inception, the CIA was deeply involved, funding the research that would eventually morph into the Google we all know today. And ever since, Google has played ball with The Blob.

The Blob: A Beast of Bureaucracy

For those unfamiliar with the term, Barack Obama gave us a gift when he coined "The Blob." It's the perfect name for the interventionist defense and foreign policy establishment that has long dictated US actions on the global stage. It's a tangled, self-sustaining bureaucracy of unelected officials, think-tanks, military contractors, and, yes, Big Tech giants like Google.

Even after its launch, Google's relationship with the CIA and Pentagon deepened. Take Google Maps, for example. It exists because Google acquired Keyhole, a satellite technology company that was owned and operated by—surprise, surprise—the CIA. Google was never a simple tech company. It was born to serve the interests of the US government and The Blob.

And here's the thing: This same Blob is behind the push for censorship across the Western world, including Australia. This isn't a random piece of legislation that our politicians suddenly decided was a good idea. They've been directed—pressured—by external forces that have long had a hand in shaping global policy. Still think our government serves you?

The Bratislava Conspiracy: How It All Went Down

In early 2017, shortly after the election of Donald Trump, the wheels of this grand censorship machine started turning in earnest. A secretive conference in Bratislava, Slovakia, brought together some of the most powerful people you've probably never heard of. Michael Chertoff, former head of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and chairman of BAE Systems—the largest military contractor in NATO—sat down with the National Endowment for Democracy (NED). NED is nothing more than a CIA cut-out, a front used to mask its interference in global politics.

Now, these two powerhouses didn't meet to enjoy a few drinks and talk about the weather. They met with the content moderation teams of Google and Facebook, and their mission was clear: Silence the populist voices rising across the globe, voices they feared could dismantle their precious liberal world order.

They showed a propaganda reel that linked alternative media and online dissent to the rise of Adolf Hitler, of all things. Brexit, the election of Trump—these were framed as catastrophes on par with the Nazi regime, a threat to global stability. And they had one enemy in their sights: "unfiltered alternative news."

Unfiltered alternative news—that's their boogeyman, punters. What they meant by that was the will of the people—the natural expression of public sentiment that bubbles up when ordinary folks have access to platforms where they can speak freely.

Censorship in the Name of "Security"

What followed was nothing less than a declaration of war on free speech. The CIA, The Blob, NATO—they all agreed that populist speech had to be stamped out. It wasn't enough to let people voice their frustrations online. If you allow people to speak freely, they said, democracy will collapse. And what they meant by democracy wasn't the will of the people—it was the will of their institutions. The unelected bureaucrats and military contractors who set the agenda while the rest of us toil away, powerless.

The scary part? They framed this as a matter of national security. They told the heads of Google and Facebook that if they didn't crack down on alternative voices online, the whole system would come crashing down. No more NATO, no more European Union, no more IMF, no more rules-based order. And guess what? They've been following through on that threat ever since.

What we're seeing now—Google suppressing search results, YouTube shadow banning users, Facebook labeling everything that doesn't fit the narrative as "misinformation"—is a direct result of that 2017 meeting. And now it's happening here in Australia, with our own politicians pushing the Misinformation and Disinformation Bill.

Why Our Politicians Are Selling Us Out

Here's the ugly truth: Our elected representatives don't have much of a choice. The international pressure is immense, and any politician who dares to speak out risks being smeared as a conspiracy theorist, a radical, or worse. They're told that they're fighting the next Hitler, that if they don't push through censorship laws, the entire global order will unravel.

It's a manipulation tactic that works. Half of the country goes along with it, not because they understand the complexities of international politics, but because they've been conditioned to fear the boogeyman—whether it's Russia, China, or a former reality TV star who dared to run for office.

We're living in a world where global elites and intelligence agencies are dictating what can and can't be said. And it's only getting worse.

Stay tuned for part two of this deep dive, where we'll unravel even more of this tangled web. It's time to wake up, mates. If we don't start speaking out now, there'll be no voices left to challenge the lies. Actually this was a pause for a toilet break, and to grab yourself a cuppa or cold one. Ready? Let's go!

Part Two: The Conspiracy of Silence – When Will We Wake Up?

I'm not surprised anymore. Nope, not one bloody bit. After seeing the way people fell into line like trained seals during the COVnID hysteria, I've come to grips with a bitter truth: most people are happy to go along to get along. They'll nod their heads and smile while the government slowly tightens the noose around their necks. You know what? That's it. I will never again underestimate the ability of people to comply, to surrender their freedom without so much as a whimper. Maybe it's the price of peace, or maybe it's just the ultimate testament to how easily manipulated we've all become.

Let's not kid ourselves – we're talking about half the country here, and it's terrifying. Half of our so-called "mates" are perfectly content to let censorship reign supreme. And it's not because these beliefs are deeply rooted or even genuinely held. No, no. These are loose beliefs, loosely held, or at best, strong beliefs loosely held. They're swept along in the temporary mania, the wave of moral panic fueled by the media muscle behind the "disinformation crisis." There's this wild narrative now that free speech is a menace, a threat to democracy, something that needs to be reined in – and they lap it up.

The truth is, if the propaganda machine that peddles this nonsense ever dried up, most people would revert to their natural state. They'd remember, deep down, that they do value free speech, even if they've been temporarily swayed by all the smoke and mirrors. But for now, they're trapped in the psychological operation, this insidious creation of a so-called "disinformation studies" field that didn't even exist a decade ago. And at the helm of this movement? A new breed of fake academics, propped up by government grants, spewing "research" about how dangerous it is for someone to post a funny meme on Twitter or upload a home made video on YouTube.

But here's the thing – and I love this bit – these so-called disinformation experts never, ever turn their magnifying glass on the government. Not even one report. Isn't that convenient? The government's lies? Their contradictions? Their endless supply of misinformation? Nope. Not a word. The biggest merchants of disinformation are sitting in government offices across the USA, the UK, Canada, New Zealand, and Australia, but we're supposed to be worried about some bloke making workout videos? Spare me the hypocrisy.

Let me break it down for you: First in line as the most prolific spreaders of misinformation and disinformation is the government. Our government, for that matter. Second, the corporate media. Those so-called "journalists" that lap up every press release and feed it back to us like mindless parrots. And then, way down the list, a distant third, are the randos on social media – the ones they want you to believe are responsible for all the evils in the world. But guess who funds the media? Yeah, you guessed it – the government and big business. So it's no surprise they work hand-in-hand to perpetuate this farce.

Here in Australia, take a look at the "fact-checkers" at Melbourne University. They're the ones who got it spectacularly wrong during the CONVID chaos, all while raking in piles of cash from the authoritarian ALP state government. The National Science Foundation has thrown over a hundred million dollars at censorship projects across more than 60 US universities during the Biden administration alone. Australia isn't far behind, with our universities getting their slice of the censorship pie, too. The FBI, the Pentagon, DHS – they're all in on it. They're funding censorship work under the guise of "counter-disinformation" and training universities, media outlets, and even NGOs to fall in line.

But don't just take my word for it – dig into the International Fact-Checking Network. You'll find at least 30 government grants from the US State Department alone. It's a vast web, a spider's web, where free speech is strangled bit by bit, all while they tell you it's for your own good. This isn't just about silencing a few dissenters. It's a global strategy – a tool of US diplomacy that stretches into every corner of the Earth, including our own backyard.

They use censorship as a way to control who rises and who falls. In Brazil, in the EU, and yes, right here in Australia, it's happening right under our noses. USAID has spent tens of millions of dollars coercing foreign governments to set up their own censorship regimes, all while coaching them on how to hide what they're doing. They don't even need to call it censorship. They are told to give it a fancy name, something like "strategic communications" or "media literacy" – anything to keep the wool over people's eyes. And our government? They're more than happy to play along.

We've seen it time and time again. The US government sanctions Iran for censorship. They sanction North Korea for censoring their media. And yet, back home, they're building the very same censorship infrastructure. The hypocrisy is staggering. It's like a sick joke, but we're the punchline.

Australia isn't immune to this rot. We've got our own bureaucrats, politicians, and so-called "elites" who are just as complicit. Look at the ALP. Look at how they've pushed the censorship agenda in parliament, all while pretending it's in the name of public safety. They've sold us out. Every last one of them. And yet, half the population will sit back and let it happen. The other half? Well, we're not going to sit idly by.

The truth is, they can't silence all of us. They can try, but it won't work. The cracks are already showing. The more they clamp down, the more people will begin to see the truth – even if it's just a glimmer at first. This is about more than just free speech. It's about our future. Our freedom. Our ability to question, to think, to dissent.

I've never been one to ask my readers to share my work. But this time, I'm making an exception. I need you to share this. I need you to stand up, to be counted, to raise your voice while you still can. They may try to silence us, but if enough of us speak, they won't be able to ignore us forever.

And to those of you who still believe everything the government and their media mouthpieces tell you? Wake up. Open your eyes. We were sold out long ago. It's not too late to fight back – but we can't do it alone. If we don't stand together now, we'll be left to wonder how we let it all slip away.

They can take away our jobs, our rights, our ability to speak freely – but they can't take away our determination. And we're not going anywhere.

So, to the rest of us who still believe in fighting for what's right: Stay strong. Stay loud. Keep pushing, because the truth will come out, and they won't be able to stop it. We're not going anywhere. They can't silence us all.

Let's make our voices heard before it's too late.

This is a call to arms, not just for the few, but for everyone who still values truth and freedom. If you're reading this and you feel that fire burning, don't let it go out. Share this, spread the word, and let's take the fight to them. We're Australians, after all – and we don't give up without a bloody good fight.

Cheers,
